

WALT: to write a setting description of the labyrinth from Theseus and the Minotaur

As Theseus stood at the entrance to the vast, mindboggling labyrinth, all sorts of grunting and gurgling noises came from within the creature's home. The labyrinth was like an enormous maze for children to play in but instead of short hedgerows it had gigantic stone walls that towered over many damp, dark passageways.

Theseus felt fearless but apprehensive at the same time.

Theseus strode through the winding, twisting and turning passageways. He passed items from the last children who had entered the labyrinth: smashed swords, torn clothes and beaten helmets. After travelling for what seemed like hours through twisting and turning passageways, he reached a crossroad. He wasn't sure which way to proceed. Each passageway seemed to have the same echoing noises within them. It sound like the grunting of a bull. He felt a afraid but he was determined to slay the savage beast.

The sky grew darker as Theseus roamed further into the maze. Frighteningly, the grunts seemed to more menacing by every step. Finally he turned a corner and his feet froze to the spot. The brave warrior could feel himself getting hotter with fear. Bang, bang, bang. The minotaur was drawing closer to Theseus with every heavy, thumping step. After what seemed like forever, finally a moonlit shadow appeared onto one of the passageway walls. Theseus knew this was going to be the biggest challenge he had ever faced.

By Luke Kinch 5D

